According to the Oxford Reference Dictionary plagiarism basically means taking the work or idea of someone else and pretending it is one's own. Plagiarism includes copying words or ideas from someone without quoting that source. Plagiarism is considered a form of copyright infringement.

In the present world plagiarism has become quite a common phenomenon especially among the school and college students. Short submissions deadlines, the lack of academic integrity, the student's ignorance, their difficulty with citing, in addition to the weakness in language skills are actually forcing many students to plagiarize. What makes it possible for the students to commit plagiarism is also the fact that they almost always go unpunished.

There have been quite a few famous cases of plagiarism in the recent past among them the well known historian and biographer of U.S. Presidents Dwight D. Eisenhower and Richard Nixon, Stephen Edwards Ambrose. In 2002, Ambrose was found to have plagiarized several passages in his book "The Wild Blue". Ambrose had taken passages from "Wings of Morning: The Story of The Last American Bomber Shot Down over Germany in World War II" by Thomas Childers.

There are means provided by the internet to stop plagiarism like Google (www.google.com). Google is essentially a search engine however it can be used to detect plagiarism because its advanced search engine capabilities are conducive to locating key phrases that may appear in students' research papers. The Glatt Plagiarism Program is another means of preventing plagiarism. Dr. Barbara Glatt has developed the 3 different software programs designed to detect and prevent plagiarism.

Read the text carefully then do the following activities.

Examinations have an important role to play in any system of education. Indeed, it is impossible to imagine a school which does not set exams for students to measure their progress and to evaluate their qualifications. As a result of being necessary, they sometimes put students under pressure and can cause stress-related conditions and panic attacks. Test anxiety can develop for a number of reasons. One major factor of stress among students is worrying about how anxiety will affect them which can be as debilitating as the anxiety itself. This kind of anxiety can interfere with the student's ability to prepare adequately.

Lack of preparation is another factor that can contribute to test anxiety. Poor time management, poor study habits, and lack of organization can lead to a student feeling overwhelmed. Student's who are forced to cram at the last minute will feel less confident than those who have been able to follow a structured plan for studying. Being able to anticipate what the exam will cover, and knowing all the information has been covered during the study sessions, can help students to enter the testing situation with a more positive attitude.

Lack of confidence, fear of failure, and other negative thought processes may also contribute to test anxiety. The pressure to perform well on exams is a great motivator unless it is so extreme that it becomes irrational. Perfectionism and feelings of unworthiness provide unreasonable goals to achieve through testing situations. When a student's self-esteem is too closely tied to the outcome of any one academic task, the results can be devastating. As a result students may spend more time focusing on the negative consequences of failure, than preparing to succeed.

Exam stress varies from person to person, there are some students who are better at handling exam stress. A lot of people find that the stress before exams is often worse than the actual exam and it can be made even worse if they have older brothers or sisters who have already done well and feel they have to match up to their standards...
